Addressing Fatherhood with Abusive Men

Monday, December 14

2 - 3:30pm Central Time*

Approved training: Rural grantees may use their federal OVW set-aside training funds to cover long distance telephone costs to attend this training and do not need to get approval from their OVW program specialist.

Many men who batter have some level of contact with children. Battered women often seek resources for men to enhance child safety and create a more nurturing environment. To ensure this, it is critical that interveners of domestic violence work with abusive men, in their roles as fathers. Batterer Intervention Program (BIP) curricula have not traditionally or systematically addressed: 1) men's relationships with their children; 2) men's use of children to abuse women; and 3) the impact that violence against women has on children. Recently however, some programs have begun to recognize these needs and incorporate them in curricula. Please join this audio conference to explore how to meet the needs of battered women and children, as well as men, and consider a variety of BIP approaches.
